Rebecca Long Bailey MP, Labour's Shadow Business Secretary, commenting on GMB's report on Amazon's public sector contracts, said:

"It is shocking that the government has spent millions with a company that makes massive profits while mistreating its workers and paying barely any tax.

"Labour in government will insist that that when taxpayer funded public services and goods are delivered by private companies, they operate to the highest standards, with a public service ethos and not simply in the interests of shareholders. We will clamp down on tax avoidance and evasion, and implement our Tax Transparency and Enforcement Programme to build an economy that works for the many, not the few."

John McDonnell responds to Boris Johnson's pledge to cut higher income tax rates

John McDonnell MP, Shadow Chancellor, commenting on Boris Johnson's pledge to cut higher income tax rates, said:

"With our schools, care for the elderly and our police services at breaking point, Boris Johnson's proposals to give a tax cut to high earners reveals how out of touch the Tories are. As predicted the Tory leadership contest is becoming a race to the bottom in tax cuts."

“Labour will put the responsibility for repairing our public services on the Top 5% and corporations, not add to the handouts the Government has already given the richest in society.”

Jeremy Corbyn pays tribute to heroism of D-Day troops

Ahead of attending the 75th anniversary commemoration of the D-Day landings in Portsmouth, Jeremy Corbyn MP, leader of the Labour Party, said:

“The troops that landed on the beaches of France 75 years ago showed unimaginable heroism. Many laid down their lives in the fight against fascism.

“People will have heard the recent serialisation of Anne Frank’s Diaries on BBC radio. It was heart-breaking to hear her excitement and optimism about the Allied landings in Normandy, shortly before she was transported to Auschwitz, and then Bergen-Belsen.

“It was a poignant reminder of the evils of Nazism, and why its defeat by the Allied forces was so essential for humanity.

“We must not just commemorate those who fought, and died, but honour them by opposing the forces of hatred today.

“Only by standing up to hate, oppression and war can we protect international cooperation and peace.”

Labour challenge Tory climate change denial at PMQs

Rebecca Long Bailey MP, Labour's Shadow Business Secretary, standing in today for Jeremy Corbyn at Prime Ministers Questions (PMQs), has highlighted climate change denial at the top of the Tory party and fears that the next Prime Minister will be unwilling to tackle the climate emergency

New research from Labour reveals that 15 of Theresa May's current and former cabinet ministers are implicated in climate change denial, including Tory leadership favourites Boris Johnson and Environment Secretary Michael Gove.

On Tory leadership candidates, analysis found that:

- Boris Johnson, Andrea Leadsom and Michael Gove have previously denied climate science.
- Dominic Raab, Matt Hancock and Esther McVey were linked to individuals or organisations promoting climate change denial.

Boris Johnson has referred to global warming as a "primitive fear" that is "without foundation". As Education Secretary, Michael Gove opposed teaching climate science in school, with his spokesperson dismissing climate science as "a particular political or ideological point of view".

On serving and former cabinet members, analysis also found:

- Three current cabinet ministers have previously denied the scientific consensus on climate change: Environment Secretary Michael Gove; International Trade Secretary Liam Fox; and Transport Secretary Chris Grayling.
- Three other cabinet ministers have close financial or professional links with organisations and individuals promoting climate change denial: Health Secretary Matt Hancock; Chief Secretary to the Treasury Liz Truss; and May herself.
- Four of May's former cabinet ministers have denied climate science:

former Foreign Secretary Boris Johnson; former Brexit Secretary David Davis; Leader of the Commons Andrea Leadsom; and former Defence Secretary Chris Grayling.

- Five other former cabinet ministers were linked to individuals or organisations promoting climate change denial: former International Development Secretary Priti Patel; former Conservative chairman Patrick McLoughlin; former Work and Pensions Secretary Esther McVey; and former Brexit secretaries David Davis and Dominic Raab.

In recent months the government has been subject to mounting criticism for ignoring the science on climate change. Last year leading climate scientist James Hansen accused government energy policy of “aping Trump”, while this March the High Court ruled government fracking policies unlawful for failing to take into account scientific evidence.

Rising public pressure forced the government into a humiliating U-turn last month when it belatedly accepted a Labour motion to declare a climate and environment emergency. But this analysis will raise fresh fears about the scale of climate change denial in the Conservative Party and whether it is capable of taking the necessary action to tackle the climate crisis.

Rebecca Long Bailey MP, Labour’s Shadow Business Secretary, speaking at PMQs, said:

“How much authority does the government really have on climate change?

“Three current ministers ‘have denied’ the scientific consensus on climate change.

“And several of those standing in the Tory leadership contest, have close links with organisations and individuals ‘promoting’ climate change.”

Labour announces plans for Overseas Loan Transparency Act

Ahead of the G20 Finance Ministers meeting this weekend, Labour announces plans for an Overseas Loan Transparency Act which will establish a new compulsory register of overseas loans.

The new Act will require all lenders from the UK to disclose loans to foreign governments.

Labour are is taking this action to put an end to exploitative secret loans to avert a new debt crisis for countries in the Global South.

Labour will take a stand against the injustice of countries having to divert money away from public services to repay unfair international debts at the same time as bearing the burden of a global climate crisis they did not create.

Countries such as Mozambique are already struggling under crippling debt burdens after London-based banks were able to issue secretive loans worth $2 billion without the knowledge of Mozambique's parliament. Subsequent debt burdens have triggered an economic crisis in the country leading to rising inflation, higher food prices and increased rural poverty.

Dan Carden MP, Labour's Acting Shadow International Development Secretary, said:

"Tackling the growing debt crisis faced by countries in the Global South is a matter of global justice and is central to our work tackling the root causes of poverty and inequality and supporting people on frontlines of the fight against poverty.

"Growing debt burdens often far outweigh any aid or charity given and can present one of the greatest threats to poverty alleviation as money that should be spent on public services is re-directed to debt repayment.

“It’s been fourteen years since Labour led the way in securing the cancellation of 130 billion dollars of debt for low-income countries at the 2005 G7 Finance Ministers meeting. And today we are once again taking action to avoid a new global debt crisis.”

John McDonnell MP, Labour’s Shadow Chancellor, said:

“We have to play our part in ending the scandal of secret loans to foreign governments.

“It’s time for the UK to take responsibility for upholding standards of probity and transparency.

“A Labour government will bring foreign policy in line with economic policy – putting justice, solidarity and fair dealing at the heart of everything we do.”
